 My idea would be to make a sidecar rig like the Ural, but with a better suspension, and a better engine/drivetrain. I'd like to use this rig for commuting in the winter months. I like the idea of using an old engine and drive train from a GL1200/1300/1500 just to give the whole rig some backbone.

 An engine swap in any vehicle where the engine is not the intended power plant is never without it's teething pains. If working through these set up problems is a fun challenge then you have the right aptitude for a project like this, otherwise this or any engine swap is not for feint of heart.
 What BMW boxer engines are best suited to a Ural frame ...
 OTOH, you can get them pretty cheap and they're easy to rebuild. Parts and knowledgeable people are everywhere to help fix them up, and putting them into a Ural is about as straight-forward as any engine swap could possibly be (heck, if I can do it anyone can do it). I just finished rebuilding a Dnepr MT-16, and I installed an R80rt engine in it.
 Engine rebuild - Soviet Steeds
 If you have a new Ural with modern engine you'll have about 40 hp. If you switch to a 1200cc like I did, you'll have about 35. The VW is much easier to tune and there's a lot more HP to pull out the engine if you want to, but that's a bit work and even more $$.

You also want mod your gearbox or FD since the RPM range of the Ural differs from the VW. VW motor in a URAL? - Nuts 'n' Bolts - Russian Iron Board
